Blockchain technology, robo-advice and other new technology based business models will heavily affect the ways how the financial industry works, but just how exactly nobody seems to know.
Fintech aims at, among other things:

- Speeding up and simplifying the settlement of transactions and the transfer of values across industries, categories, borders, etc.
- transactions without identification, but also reuse and transfer of identifications, and replacement and rerouting of traditional communication lines.

How will these Fintech functions be implemented in the existing legal framework regulating the financial market?
Will the necessary technologies be patented, or fully disclosed (open source)?
Will this be the end of data protection as we know it or its new beginning?
These are just some of the business and legal questions that our distinguished panelists will discuss during this upcoming event. The business case of Lykke Exchange will be the starting point.
